Since the Annual you are about to look through is the first "yearbook" the Philadelphia College of Art has ever had, its mere existence would seem to make it a landmark. It is unique, though, for another reason: in its individual, even idiosyncratic way, it sums up the excitement, the vitality, and the temperament of our school. Because it represents a college whose curriculum is oriented toward visual communication, the Annual is primarily a visual experience. Besides this introduction, therefore, you will find no other text.

This is, moreover, a personal statement. The initial conception and all the labor was that of one man, a student who - as far as I know - was given a free hand to do whatever he wanted. Possibly our artistic freedom here at The Philadelphia College of Art has made us blasé, but the fact that a student would be entrusted with such a responsibility bespeaks an unusually far-sighted and adventurous faculty and administration.

Ordinarily, yearbooks are dull affairs: the products of committees and sub-committees, of staffs and advisors and experts, of scores of gifted men and women who - forced to work as a team - usually manage to lose whatever made them individually valuable and are virtually compelled to turn out a dreary replica of every yearbook of every graduating class of every college.

You have seen countless of them: photos of disembodied faces nailed down next to personal data (nicknames, ambitions, and club affiliations) whose very formality proves the impersonality their administrators would hasten to deny; group pictures of a room full of stiffes that would warm the heart of any social realist or mortician; the cafeteria chef and his staff in their hospital whites; the bilious football coach and his boys; the members of the Chess Club who - by the looks of them - will probably all wind up in the CIA; the Poetry Club; the fraternities; the sororities; the daisy chain. Photo after dismal photo. Pose after studied pose. Everything is clean, rigid, well-ordered, symmetrical, with the deceptive brightness of a military inspection in the split-second after reality has frozen to attention, before the chaos of real life resumes once more.

You will find no lies in this Annual: no dull, bureaucratic deceptions. The poses, when they occur, are nude, without covering and ornament. You will find the disorder and beauty you have become accustomed to, unaware of how precious and unparalleled it is. You will find the loneliness and the gregariousness that - far from being obstacles - are the twin poles of creativity. You will find yourself and your classmates in moments of disciplined absorption and of relaxed frivolity.

And so, where you may have expected a "yearbook," a plodding chronicle of one of the most crucial experiences of your life, you have been offered a love poem.
